Whether you're a new gardener or one with lots of experience, you might not know that some plants close their flowers at night. Although the reason for this behavior isn't fully understood, it may have to do with the habits of insects that visit the plant to spread pollen. Flowers may only stay open in the daytime because this is when the particular insects that visit them are active; closing at night may also protect the pollen from unwanted pests. Types of Flowers That Close at Night 21 September, 2017. glorious morning glory image by JLycke from Fotolia.com. Most of us know of a few flowers that close at night. This plant behavior is called nyctinasty, and it is the term used when flowers are open during the day, and then close at night. According to the online publication site of NewScientist, some plants open and close their flowers so punctually that it was once popular to plant them to resemble a clock face. Which Flowers Close at Night? At Day's Close is an amazing history book, full of details from literature and art in general about nightlife in the past. However, it is, in my opinioo, too scholarly focused every now and then: at some points it seems to be a mere recollection of data, unable to account for a general all-comprehensive and gathering trend, a link capable of binding all those relevant pieces of information.
