Larkin Comments about High Windows by Philip Larkin. Cedric Bixler-Zavala (12/25/2008 6:10:00 PM) I agree with what has been said about the poem already. The sharp, shocking start almost blends and smoothens out towards the ending lines. This is one of those Larkin poems that showcases hope. A hope to reach something that is greater and much beyond us. High Windows Poem by Philip Larkin - Poem

Hunter Nomination: High Windows [12 February 1967. From High Windows] Favourite poems: very difficult. I got 10 on a first run through the Collected Poem. Philip Larkin - High Windows "High Windows" is a poem from Philip Larkin 's final poetry collection, published in 1974, which carries the same title. He is one of Britain's most celebrated poets of the twentieth century.... High Windows Analysis - eNotes.com "High Windows," a lyric of twenty lines which became the title poem of Philip Larkin's fourth and final collection of verse, appears roughly midway through the Collected Poems, and its position there is paradoxically both emblematic and deceptive. I say emblematic because Larkin consistently steers a middle course between opposites—between freedom and formal restraint, between naked confession and coy diffidence, between desire and the realization of desire. High Windows | Encyclopedia.com In "High Windows" by Philip Larkin, the narrator sees a young couple and immediately assumes that they are probably having sex.
